N.C. Wyeth (1882-1945)

Newell Convers Wyeth was one of America's foremost illustrators of the 20th century. His renowned images of armor-clad knights and swashbuckling pirates fueled the imaginations of readers for generations.

In 1902 Wyeth moved from Needham, Massachusetts to Wilmington to study at the Howard Pyle School of Art. Pyle was not only a teacher to Wyeth but also a mentor, and the student quickly developed into one of the period's most sought-after magazine illustrators. The early success of his paintings created as illustrations for Treasure Island in 1911 led to further commissions for Kidnapped (1913), The Boy's King Arthur (1917), The Last of the Mohicans (1919), and The Yearling (1939), all done while continuing his own private artistic pursuits.

Wyeth settled in Chadds Ford in 1907, later building a house and studio that are now part of the Brandywine River Museum of Art and open seasonally to the public. He and his wife, Carolyn, raised five talented children, among them artist

Andrew Wyeth. Though he died prematurely in 1945, N.C. Wyeth's imagination and larger-than-life personality helped shape two generations of artists in his own family and many more in the broader art world.

Untitled (Chadds Ford landscape), 1903

Oil on canvas

Purchased with Museum funds, 2019

In this very early depiction of Chadds Ford, N. C. Wyeth examines the landscape around his new surroundings. Though Wyeth settled in nearby Wilmington, Delaware, Chadds Ford was the location of famed illustrator Howard Pyle's summer school, which Wyeth attended. Having only recently moved from Needham, Massachusetts, he painted this work to send back home to his parents to show them his new environs. After Wyeth married Carolyn Bockius, the couple moved to Chadds Ford in 1908, where the Wyeths would eventually build a home and raise their family.

Chadds Ford Landscape – July 1909, 1909

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wyeth, 1970

In this view of the village of Chadds Ford, Wyeth records the hot, muggy atmosphere of a Brandywine July. From about 1908 to 1912, Wyeth experimented with various Impressionist techniques in small scale landscapes. Like the Impressionists, Wyeth painted this work outside, directly in the landscape, a technique known as painting en plein air. The looser brush strokes that appear as individual dabs of paint reflect a modern approach to landscape that captures a moment in time.

Captain Nemo, 1918

Oil on canvas

The Andrew and Betsy Wyeth Collection

Jules Verne's novel The Mysterious Island was originally published in 1875 as a sequel to his Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea, with the famed Captain Nemo appearing in both books. N. C. Wyeth's portrait of the character is an unforgettable image. The Captain's eerie skin color is Wyeth's interpretation of the effect of electric light in the undersea salon of the legendary recluse. Wyeth conceived the sumptuous peacock tapestry behind the figure to allude to Nemo's past life as the wealthy and learned Prince Dakkar of India, the peacock's native habitat.

The Mysterious Island, cover illustration,

1918

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. S. Hallock du Pont, Jr., 1992

In his cover illustration for Jules Verne's The Mysterious Island, N. C. Wyeth presents the daring escapade that sets the story's adventure in motion. The five characters (and one dog) featured on the cover are escaped prisoners of war at the Siege of Richmond during the American Civil War. The group takes flight on a hydrogen-filled observation balloon. As depicted by Wyeth, they precariously hang on to the remnant of the balloon as it is carried into darkness by a strong wind. The castaways finally land on the titular "Mysterious Island," which they eventually learn is the secret base for the legendary

Captain Nemo and his submarine, the Nautilus.

Portrait of a Dog, 1933

Oil on canvas

Bequest of Carolyn Wyeth, 1996

This clever painting is a portrait within a portrait, a combination of figures—human and canine—seen from various angles.

Young Andrew Wyeth, then fifteen-years-old, takes pencil in hand to render a portrait of the Wyeth family dog, Lupe.

Andrew's friend David Lawrence holds Lupe in place, while she turns her best side to the artist. In this painting, N. C. Wyeth provides two portraits of the dog: the painted version with head in three-quarter view and the drawn version that Andrew captures in profile.

My Mother, 1929

Oil on canvas

Bequest of Carolyn Wyeth, 1996

An extraordinarily influential presence in her son's life, Henriette Zirngiebel Wyeth encouraged her son's earliest artistic endeavors. In return, he confided to her a career's worth of aspirations and frustrations in hundreds of letters written from 1902 until her death in 1925. In his posthumous portrait, N.C. Wyeth depicts his mother in the kitchen of his boyhood home in Needham, Massachusetts. The figure outside the window is Wyeth's maternal grandfather, walking the path to his house next door. The skewed perspective of walls and tabletop and his mother's indistinct features suggest dream imagery created from intense emotion.

N.C. Wyeth (1882-1945)

Nightfall, 1942

Tempera on hardboard

Bequest of Helen and John Kenefick, 2019

Nightfall is the last of the monumental temperas that occupied N. C. Wyeth in the 1940s prior to his sudden death. The painting demonstrates his mastery, decades into his career, in creating a powerful sense of narrative.

Correspondence reveals that the artist based the composition on a Chadds Ford farmer whose wife was dying, her presence symbolized by light emanating from the upstairs window in the distant house. The enigmatic expression on the farmer's face denotes both strength and vulnerability.

Wyeth's letters at the time indicate his own dark mood, fueled by anxiety related to the ongoing war as well as concern for his own artistic legacy.

N.C. Wyeth (1882-1945)

Captain Brown, Port Clyde, Maine, ca. 1934

Oil on canvas

Bequest of Carolyn Wyeth, 1996

A note in N.C. Wyeth's hand identifies the subject of this painting as Captain Brown, but the figure appears to be more of an archetype of a salty New England fisherman. Scalloped wave forms, both near and far, transform the watery surroundings into sharp, sculpted surfaces. There is no attempt to disguise the brushwork of the foreground, which is left unblended and loose. Dark clouds build on each side of the solitary fisherman, creeping across the sky in an ominous and fantastic manner.

N.C. Wyeth (1882-1945)

Fairy Cove, Port Clyde, ca. 1925/1930

Oil on canvas

Bequest of Carolyn Wyeth, 1996

The lush, loose brushwork of this painting demonstrates N.C. Wyeth's growing range of styles in the 1920s. Painting over a 1921 illustration for The Ladies Home Journal, Wyeth casts off the business of commercial illustration for a much more personal painting done during a summer spent with his family in Maine. The tall spindly pines block the view of the beach beyond, which the Wyeth children called Fairy Cove. The glints of sunlight filtering through the trees enliven the foreground and contrast with the hazy atmosphere of the background.

N.C. Wyeth (1882-1945)

John Teel, Port Clyde, ca. 1934

Oil on canvas

Bequest of Carolyn Wyeth, 1996

The beaming rays of sunlight in John Teel, Port Clyde send a prismatic ripple of color across the surface of the canvas. The houses atop the hill virtually jitter with energy as they are struck by the sun's rays. John Teel anchors the painting with his weighty stance, even as the dock on which he is standing crumbles beneath his feet. N.C. Wyeth painted four similar portraits of Teel between 1933 and 1940, all in this experimental Modernist style. The Boston Herald reviewed one version quite favorably, calling it "the artist's symbol of Americans facing uncertainty with hope, grim determination, and a rock-ribbed intent to stand fast."

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Lester, 1963

Oil on canvas

Private collection

Just seventeen years old when he completed this remarkable portrait, Jamie Wyeth demonstrated near mastery of the realist tradition in his youth. Lester shows off a variety of technical feats: from capturing a strikingly realistic portrait, to handling the variety of white tones needed to delineate the wrinkles of the shirt, to the expert control of the subtle shifts in skin tone. Wyeth's work in this phase of his career has often been compared with that of seventeenth-century Dutch painters who were known for rendering meticulous detail.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Portrait of Jeffrey, 1966

Oil on canvas

Private Collection

Early in his career, Jamie Wyeth's exceptional talent in realism found expression in portraiture, both commissioned and non-commissioned. He could just as easily have been found painting a friend or local resident as painting the President of the United States, as he would in 1967 when John F. Kennedy's family asked Wyeth to paint a posthumous portrait. In Portrait of Jeffrey, a great darkness envelops the sitter, yet an unseen bright light creates a glare on his glasses. The reflected light obscures our view of Jeffrey's eyes, putting the viewer at a disadvantage since Jeffrey—with the help of his glasses—undoubtedly sees us with great clarity.

This bold image of Jamie Wyeth's closest childhood friend, Jimmy Lynch, is among the artist's most imaginative early portraits. Lynch originally posed for the painting wearing an aviator's scarf and goggles, but, after seeing Marlon Brando in The Wild One (1953), arrived at the studio dressed as he is here. Lynch's attire and bad-boy stance embody the rebellious attitude of many young people during the politically turbulent 1960s. Ironically, Lynch received his draft notice the day the painting was completed.

Deo du Pont Weymouth, 1966

Oil on canvas

Gift of McCoy duPont Weymouth in honor of the 50th Anniversary of the Brandywine Conservancy and Museum of Art

The elegant sitter in this portrait by Jamie Wyeth is Dulcinea Ophelia Payne du Pont Weymouth, better known as Deo. Born in 1909 into the prominent du Pont family of Wilmington, Delaware, she led a life of racing and breeding horses and quiet philanthropy, including major support to the Brandywine River Museum of Art. She was an artist herself, as was her son George A. Weymouth, one of the founders of the museum. In his dramatically lit portrait of her, Wyeth emphasizes her arched brow and engaging gaze as she perches in an unusually asymmetrical chair.

Frolic, 2016

Acrylic, enamel, oil, on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert V. Kohler, Jr. in honor of the 50th Anniversary of the Brandywine Conservancy and Museum of Art

In this exuberantly handled painting, Jamie Wyeth honors his close friend, George A. "Frolic" Weymouth (1936-2016). Weymouth was one of the founding board members of the Brandywine Conservancy and Museum of Art and its chairman for almost fifty years. Working with a variety of media, textures, and colors, Wyeth presents Weymouth driving four hours, all rendered so loosely that some areas of the canvas are visible. Together with the vigorous, animated brushwork of the background – in vibrant green and yellow hues denoting the first signs of spring – Wyeth not only creates an impression of the carriage's swift movement through the landscape but also draws attention to Weymouth's richly hued face and steely concentration.

Bale, 1972

Oil on canvas

The Phyllis and Jamie Wyeth Collection

Wyeth observed this particular bale of hay in different light and at different times of day, even during a solar eclipse, which cast sparkling, direct sunlight over the bale and inspired the dark, muted palette of the background. "I wanted to do the definitive portrait of a bale of hay," he said. "I lived and breathed that thing for a month.

Dreamed about it." He went so far as to use some of the hay in his paint to emphasize the bale's rough, spiky texture. According to Wyeth, "Things like the bale are not scenes. They are objects that mean more than just the appearance to me."

Corn Crib, 1964

Watercolor on paper

The Andrew and Betsy Wyeth Collection

As a teenager, Jamie Wyeth was known to roam the farms in the vicinity of Chadds Ford, Pennsylvania. Several of his earliest works, such as this watercolor, depict the scenes he found on his wanders. The hollow spaces of barns, such as those of Overhang and Lime Bag (also on view in this gallery) became fodder for his growing talent. In Corn Crib, Wyeth takes on the challenging regularity of the structure's slatted walls, which were designed to allow air circulation in order to aid in the drying of grains. So detailed is Wyeth's rendering that the maker and type of feed pictured is readily evident as John W. Eshelman and Sons of Lancaster's Pennsy scratch feed for chickens. The Eshelman plant was also the subject of the Lancaster modernist painter Charles Demuth in 1930.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Lucette's Nursing Home, 1965

Watercolor on paper

Gift of Ruth A. Yerion, 1980

A teenager Jamie Wyeth challenged himself to capture the distinctly detailed architectural features of the façade of Lucette's Nursing Home, in Thomaston, Maine, not far from his family's summer residence. The colorful gingerbread accents on the Victorian home are approached with mathematical precision, despite the fluid nature of the watercolor medium. The brightly colored paint scheme contrasts with the building's sleepy disposition conveyed by the closed and half-closed green shades in the windows. Originally built in 1876 by Captain Thomas Williams, the house later became a convalescent home, known as "The Lucette," run by the Luce family.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Boundary Pins, Monhegan, 1974

Watercolor on paper

Private collection

Jamie Wyeth first visited Monhegan in the mid-1950s when he went with his father to sketch and paint on the island. He has worked there off and on ever since, in all seasons, living in a house he bought in 1968. Located about ten miles off the coast of Maine, Monhegan's combination of beauty, remoteness, and the picturesque character of its buildings have drawn many artists to its shores. Aware of the island's long artistic legacy, Wyeth began to paint what have been described as "portraits" of the island's elements, inhabitants, and rustic buildings – weathered and worn – including Boundary Pins, Monhegan, which speaks to the storied past of the island.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

White House, 1965

Watercolor on paper

Gift of E. I. du Pont de Nemours and
Company in honor of the Brandywine
Conservancy and Museum of Art's 50th
Anniversary, 2017

Created in the same year as Lucette's Nursing Home, hanging nearby, White House is another of Jamie Wyeth's architectural studies. Though Victorian in style, as evidenced by the gray, sloped Mansard roof, the architectural details here are minimal. There are no figures in the scene, nor any signs of habitation except for the aerial antenna on the roof. Wyeth's choices on what to include influence our estimation of the house, suggesting it is empty and perhaps even lonely, if a house can have such emotions. To capture this "portrait," Wyeth positioned himself not in the front of the building, but at a slight angle so that the house appears to be looking askance, as if it were disinterested in our gaze.

A Very Small Dog, 1980

Oil on canvas

Gift of MBNA America, 2003

Nestled in an ornate wicker pram, under a lacy parasol, is, indeed, a very small dog, as the title of this painting suggests.

Although the fierce little creature is being treated like royalty, it is clearly very displeased. Baring its tiny teeth amidst the swirls, hearts, and flowers of its elaborate confine, the tiny dog's aggression contrasts sharply with the loving attention lavished upon it.

The Raven, 1980

Oil on canvas

Purchased with Museum funds, 1992

“I was alone for two months when I was doing [The Raven], and I got this whole thing of, ‘Is it alive with me, in the dark?’ Totally freaked me out.” -Jamie Wyeth

This large-scale painting marks Jamie Wyeth’s transition from New York City to the worlds of Monhegan Island and Southern Island in Maine. After seeing the painting at Wyeth’s solo exhibition at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts in 1980, Andy Warhol noted in his diary that “Jamie is painting bigger – more Pop – pictures now. I told him he should go even bigger.” With mottled, glossy feathers and one gleaming, beady eye, this larger-than-life raven approaches the edge of the canvas with its beak partly open, ready to attack its prey.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Portrait of Pig, 1970

Oil on canvas

Gift of Betsy James Wyeth, 1984

Den Den, the pig in this portrait, belonged to a neighboring farmer, but endeared herself to Jamie Wyeth, who brought her to his farm, Point Lookout. Wyeth works closely with his portrait subjects, whether human or animal. To occupy her during long hours of posing, Wyeth fed her sweet feed, a mixture of grains and molasses, and played classical music. Wyeth's thickly applied oil paint reveals Den Den as both a personality and an interesting shape with texture. Life-size scale adds to the impact of this portrait.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Lime Bag, ca. 1964

Oil on panel

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wyeth, 1970

Completed while Jamie Wyeth was still a teenager, Lime Bag records a view into the dusty and dark recesses of a stone barn. Wyeth's technique, subject matter, and palette at this stage of his career are still closely tied to those of his father, Andrew Wyeth, and grandfather N. C. Wyeth. As viewer, we stand at the threshold of the barn, where a bag of lime—added to soil to improve its quality and also used to make whitewash—has split open and spilled.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Overhang, 1965

Oil on canvas

Anonymous gift, 1997

In this early farm scene, Jamie Wyeth creates a strictly balanced composition of forms and light. The central stucco support bisects the darkness created by the shadow of the overhanging barn. The strong horizontal of the barn is offset by the gently suggested boards of the vertical siding. The off-center window with missing panes adds an element of asymmetry to the canvas. Fitting for a farm, the overall palette presents a wide range of earth tones. Farm life and scenery, from ominous barns to playful livestock, are a staple of Wyeth's long career.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Over a period of six decades, Jamie Wyeth has created a highly personal body of work. Familiar subjects – whether they be people, animals, or landscapes – are transformed by the artist's hand and limitless imagination.

The youngest child of Andrew and Betsy Wyeth, Jamie Wyeth demonstrated an advanced drawing ability as a child while he studied under his aunt, Carolyn Wyeth. Although embracing the figurative tradition of his father and grandfather early on, Wyeth developed a distinctive approach that incorporated a vast array of experiences, including his immersion in Andy Warhol's Factory and the New York art scene in the 1970s. Wyeth has continued the family tradition of painting in Chadds Ford and in Maine, but his dramatic compositions – featuring pronounced shifts of scale and viewpoints, dream-like imagery, visceral gestures, and bold color palette – are entirely his own.

N.C. Wyeth's Island Funeral

Island Funeral was the centerpiece of N.C. Wyeth's first and only one-artist gallery exhibition at New York's Macbeth Gallery, which presented Wyeth as a fine artist rather than an illustrator. All his life, he struggled to shed the pejorative connotations associated with illustration, and more than any other painting, the multi-layered Island Funeral demonstrates his consummate artistry of composition, color, and expression.

Island Funeral was inspired by the funeral of Rufus Washington Teel, a Main fisherman, who died in September 1934. Teel was born, lived, and died on Teel Island, about a mile offshore from the village of Port Clyde where the Wyeths had a summer home. N.C. Wyeth's daughter Ann Wyeth McCoy remembered that the family sat on the porch of their home and watched the boats pass on the way to and from the funeral.

One of the most striking features of the painting is the intensity of the blues and greens Wyeth used, the result of an informal collaboration with the DuPont Company. Chemists employed at the company's Jackson Laboratory provided Wyeth with pigments made from new vibrant light-fast dyes that had been recently developed at DuPont.

N.C. Wyeth (1882-1945)

Island Funeral, 1939

Egg tempera and oil on hardboard

Gift of E. I. du Pont de Nemours and

Company in honor of the Brandywine

Conservancy and Museum of Art's 50th

Anniversary

Originally conceived as an illustration for Kenneth Roberts's 1938 book Trending into Maine, Island Funeral developed into an independent composition. In this painting, N.C. Wyeth used an aerial view to depict people gathering for the funeral of the patriarch of a large and historic Maine lobstering family. Wyeth was inspired by the sight of boats arriving on the family island, each bearing mourners for 96-year-old Rufus Teel. While Wyeth had painted members of the Teel family on other occasions, this painting focuses not on specific individuals but rather on the rituals of the funeral. Like Wyeth himself, his gallerist Robert Macbeth saw the painting as a major achievement of Wyeth's career and insisted on its presence in Wyeth's first solo exhibition in New York in 1939.

N.C. Wyeth (1882-1945)

Three Fishermen, ca. 1934

Oil on canvas

Bequest of Carolyn Wyeth, 1996

N.C. Wyeth's painting of three fisherman set against the backdrop of the sea has been compared to the Maine work of both Rockwell Kent (1882-1971) and Marsden Hartley (1877-1943). The broad and solid masses of the fishermen themselves, with their feet planted firmly on the dock, lend an air of monumentality to the figures. Their triangular forms rise up against their environment, culminating in their heads, which Wyeth placed directly on the horizon. This composition of Three Fishermen stayed with Wyeth, who painted another version of it in 1938, with only minor changes.

N.C. Wyeth (1882-1945)

The Drowning, 1936

Oil on canvas

Bequest of Carolyn Wyeth, 1996

N. C. Wyeth made this work in response to the death of sixteen-year-old Douglas Anderson, the Wyeth family's friend and neighbor in Port Clyde, Maine. Anderson disappeared while lobstering in September 1935. Months later, Anderson's father and younger brother Walt found the boy's body floating in the water off Horse Point—a rocky, tree strewn landscape very similar to that which is rendered by Wyeth. His stormy sea kicks up sharp-edged waves tossing the empty boat, which itself played a painful role in the tragedy: Anderson was not in the sturdy dory represented by Wyeth, but in a much more flimsy skiff, a craft sadly unsuited for his task.

Reflection on N.C. Wyeth's relationship with Maine

*"It is the extraction of the abstraction that I want to get out of this beloved spot." –
N.C. Wyeth to Sidney M. Chase, Port Clyde, Maine, July 26, 1925*

Unlike many of his contemporaries in the American art world of the 1920s and 1930s, N.C. Wyeth found little creative impulse in burgeoning urban environments, or the effects of such modernity on the human psyche. Informed by his passion for the writings of the nineteenth-century naturalist Henry David Thoreau, he drew inspiration from interaction with the natural world and reflections on man's place within it. The rurality of Chadds Ford stimulated Wyeth for years, but in 1920, he purchased a summer home in the tiny fishing village of Port Clyde, Maine, which provided him with a compelling tableau of stunning coastal scenery populated by indomitable fishermen and their families. The new setting was an opportunity, he wrote, "...to outgrow 'the picturesqueness...and strike at something bigger' in his painting."

Wyeth christened the old sea captain's house "Eight Bells," a painting by Winslow Homer, and hung a reproduction of the famous work in the living room, a reminder of Homer's distinctly American art. Homer, who, during the last part of his life, painted in a seaside studio in Prouts Neck, Maine, was one of the few artists Wyeth admired, particularly for the older artist's celebrated authenticity which derived from close observation of the sea, land and sky.

For twenty-five years, the village of Port Clyde, its hardy breed of fishermen, and the eternal sea fueled Wyeth's creative spirit. In 1939, for his first solo gallery exhibition in New York City, he selected twelve paintings to present to the public and critics – eleven of those depicted Maine subjects.

As the work in this gallery attests, his Maine paintings vary widely in style, subject matter and emotional content. Over the years, he employed an array of techniques, materials, and palettes to translate his personal vision of his coastal experiences and observations into images of universal appeal. Many of Wyeth's Maine paintings, such as the riveting *Island
Funeral*, are among the most seminal and complex of his career.

Late Spring Morning, ca. 1915/1917

Oil on canvas

Gift of Carolyn Wyeth in memory of her dog "Husky," 1976

Landscape work was extremely important to N.C. Wyeth throughout his career and he explored many different painting styles to interpret his views. As part of Wyeth's experimentation with the style of Impressionism, Late Spring Morning captures the play of light and shadow across a pasture. The palette is quite light and filled with fresh spring colors – even the shadows glow. Though primarily thought of as an illustrator, Wyeth's more personal paintings reflect his interest in the development of the broader art world.

Jamie Wyeth (b. 1946)

Kent House, 1972

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wyeth, 1985

Jamie Wyeth lives and paints on Monhegan Island in a house built by the artist Rockwell Kent in 1907. Wyeth purchased the property when he was 22 years old, using proceeds from his first solo exhibition. His admiration for Kent is reflected in the dramatic depiction of the structure, which hangs perilously above the sea on a rocky outcrop. Rather than emphasize the precarious placement of the house, Wyeth's perspective depicts the house atop a massive foundation of rock. The clear delineation of land and sky seems inspired by Kent's geometric approach to composing landscapes.
